

Toymakers Offer Holiday Preview

There's no time better than mid-June to start worrying about which toys the kids in your life will start begging for come December. But if the Toy Industry Association's holiday preview was any indication, there's a good chance that toy will have some sort of high tech element unheard of when mom and dad were kids.

Karito Kids, coupled with books, were built help teach kids about other countries and cultures. The high tech part comes when the child actually gets to help someone the same ethnic background as their doll.

to

"When you purchase the doll and the book, three percent of the retail price actually goes to help another child around the world," said Laura Rangel, Karito Kids.